“Nothing transforms a city more than strong and energized leadership.”

NANCY COFFEE, president and CEO of The New Memphis Institute, an influential, community-based leadership development group in Memphis, TN.

Coffee speaks from firsthand experience. Grounded by the belief that individuals are the linchpin for positive community change, The New Memphis Institute (formerly The Leadership Academy) has a 30-year track record for nurturing leaders from all walks of life.
“Our partnership with CCL helps me sell participation in the program,” Coffee said. “The Center is known globally as the gold standard in leadership development for executives, so the senior leaders we approach know they will be participating in a quality initiative.”

Since 2004, the more recently developed Fellows initiative has trained 200 emerging leaders from 130 organizations. Though the year-long program is underwritten by corporate and foundation support, participants commit to pay back that investment by tackling challenging community service projects. CCL provides three days of custom leadership training and assessment to help participants build the strong foundational skills they need to succeed.

Participated in the Masters and Fellows program
“Many times Fellows come into the program with personal ambition for civic engagement but don’t know how to put their passion into action,” Coffee explained. “We give them the tools, experiences and exposure to channel that passion and fuel positive change.”

One Fellows graduate who has seen the difference the program can make is Spence Wilson Jr., vice president of Kemmons Wilson Companies.

“What impacted me the most was coming together with a very diverse group of people, learning a lot about each other and, more importantly, learning to appreciate our different talents and skill sets,” Wilson said. “While many of us pursued different initiatives, we were all connected to a common mission—helping to make our community a better place.”

Commitment to Community and One Another

The power of the Masters and Fellows programs is multiplied by the interplay between the two. Experienced Masters graduates serve as consultants and mentors to Fellows as they tackle community action projects. They serve on project review boards, provide guidance and help to marshal community resources. The Fellows program, in turn, has reinvigorated Masters alumni by providing a meaningful outlet for what they’ve learned.

“It’s a wonderful partnership,” said Pam Shipp, of CCL, an adjunct faculty member for the Masters program who has watched the program evolve over time. “There simply is a heightened commitment to community and to one another.”
The impact of the Institute’s programs is seen both in an expanded network of individuals who can be rallied behind a cause and in concrete programs that are changing the community landscape.

Recent action projects include an internship program for at-risk youth, training programs to help school principals make more informed technology decisions, a nonpartisan election guide, a program to match newcomers with established city residents, and a middle school program to help kids imagine and prepare for a higher education.

Importantly, the Institute also is promoting retention of key talent. A recent survey shows more than nine out of 10 Fellows graduates are committed to staying in Memphis because of the connections they’ve built through their training and engagement in the community.

“The Institute is infusing Memphis with an army of trained, connected community leaders who are helping us make a significant and lasting contribution,” Coffee says. “Intensifying their passion for the city is helping us spread that commitment across their broad sphere of influence.”
