The Path of Power

What makes a good leader? Is there a certain set of leadership traits that work for every industry, for all purposes?

The theory of servant leadership, which dates back to the early 1980s, holds that a leader must be a servant first, putting the needs of the people they serve ahead of their own.

In the current climate of business, where innovation and adaptability are key, the concept of servant leadership is more relevant than ever. Leaders who are willing to step back and listen, to put the needs of their team and organization first, are essential for success.

But what does this look like in practice? How can leaders effectively serve their teams while also driving the business forward?

One approach is to focus on building a culture of feedback and open communication. Leaders who are willing to have difficult conversations and to listen actively are better equipped to develop their teams and drive results.

Another key element is to empower employees and give them the tools they need to succeed. Leaders who are willing to take risks and to trust their teams are more likely to see positive results.

In the end, the path to power is one of continuous learning and growth. Leaders who are willing to embrace change and to seek out new challenges are more likely to succeed.

To learn more about this topic, Bill Pasmore, author of the book "The Path of Power," will be sharing his insights in an upcoming webinar. Register now to join the conversation.

October 2016